

Sustainable spirits to sip this Earth Day

From gin to rum to liqueur, these brands honour the planet with every pour.

Crafting spirits is an art that's deeply rooted in honouring the earth: The grains, fruits, and botanicals that are fermented and distilled to produce liquor have always been carefully sourced for their purity, essence and flavour. It's a process that respects the natural ingredients and the environment they come from, which may be why today's spirit-makers around the world are increasingly turning towards sustainability as a central tenet of their approach. In addition to implementing standard measures like water recycling systems and solar power, brands are dedicating themselves to their immediate surroundings in innovative ways: tequila master distillers in Oaxaca, Mexico, are working to protect local bat populations; and vodka distillers in Iceland are powering their operations with renewable geothermal energy from local volcanoes. Every type of liquor is being approached in a new way, and these products speak to the results.

Tequilas

Mijenta Tequila Reposado

Mijenta is the first certified B Corp tequila brand. The facility is fully carbon-neutral and uses a combination of materials to package the product sustainably – the Reposado bottles are recycled glass, the labels made of agave waste and boxes 100% post-consumer recycled paper. The tequila is aged up to 6 months in a blend of American white oak, French oak and French acacia casks, which produces a mature and full expression with a long finish on the palate.
